ces the book containing an account of the marriage and sundry letters, once sup-pressed, would shortly be published, the explanation being, the violation of a solemn agreement by the relatives of Dr. Kane.
The book, as we learn from a Philadelphia paper, has made its appearance, and we find in the same paper the author's ac-count of the marriage, over the authenticity of which an attempt is made to throw a doubt. We quote what the book says on this interesting point:

"Shortly before his departure Dr. Kane came to tea and spent the evening as usual with his beloved. Reclining on the sofa, he talked despondingly of what might happen in his absence. His Health was precarious; he might be ill, he might die. If I send for you, my own Maggie, will you come to me? he asked. 'Certainly I will,' she answered. 'I fear you would esitate,' he murmured, 'and yet you know you are my own—my wife! You remember what I have told you! A moment afterwards he added: 'Would you like me to repeat what I have said, formally, in the presence of your mother? Such a declaration, in the presence of witnesses.

Some time ago we published a statement, full of romantic interest, concerning the secret marriage of the distinguished Dr.

Kane, of Arctic memory, with Miss Fox, of Rochester-Knockings memory. The article stated also under what circumstan-ence of witnesses, is sufficient to consti-tute a legal and binding marriage; a marringe as firm as if the ceremony took place before a magistrate. Attend to me, Maggie, would you be willing now to en-ter into such a bond?" At this moment Miss Catharine Fox came into the room Dr. Kane desired her to call her mother who came up stairs to the parior; the servant and a young lady who was spending the evening there, being also present. Dr. Kane informed them he had sent for them to witness the solemn declaration that would follow. Then, standing up and holding Margaret's hand, while his left arm encircled her form he said "Mag-gie is my wife, and I am her husband. Wherever we are she is mine and I am her's.
